

I think it is a travesty that anyone would consider censoring what satellite radio can and cannot offer to its paying customers. I am a paying XM radio for a service. It is their duty to offer me the best service possible, which includes traffic and weather. Perhaps if regular broadcast radio could figure out a way to offer me digital service, uninterrupted by commercials, and extensive enough to meet my ever changing listening needs they would not have to worry about XM radio. XM radio should not be censored as to what types of programming it can offer paying customers. Instead of blocking XM how about telling broadcast to get off their high horses and find a way to compete fairly. After all that is the American way. Sean Howley
